

In order that the sun might not annoy any of the spectators, he [Julius Caesar] had curtains stretched over them made of silk, according to some accounts. Now this fabric is an invention of barbarian luxury, and has come down from them even to us to please the picky taste of fine ladies.

-Cassius Dio, Roman History (circa 210 – 220 CE) excerpt